It Will Happen In One Day!

Thank you for watching another video from "God's News in the News." In this series, we explore current global events and look for the biblical significance behind them, much like the sons of Issachar who understood their times and knew the appropriate actions to take. We strive to be like the Bereans, who diligently studied the scriptures to discover deeper truths.

Today, I want to discuss a perspective that many find hard to believe, although it is echoed in various prophetic messages. Some believe that before human life existed on Earth, a group of aliens decided to create mankind using their own DNA and the elements from the young planet. They didn't watch from afar; instead, they chose to interact with humanity, albeit vaguely to minimize their influence. These aliens, capable of time travel, avoided direct interference to preserve the natural course of events they foresaw, yet they showed care by preparing humans for significant future events. Their one attempt to reveal their true identities went terribly, leading to their rejection and brutal assault, although, being advanced beings, they healed themselves and left, vowing to return to assert control the way they originally intended.

This narrative, though it sounds like a plot from a science fiction novel, is how some view the Christian belief system. They see our teachings as fantastical and absurd, clashing drastically with the evolutionary theory on the origin of life. They dismiss the Bible and its teachings as nonsensical religiosity and concocted tales, similar to those that start with fishing stories and evolve into alien conspiracies.

The rise of prophetic voices online, who are often dismissed by other Christians as false prophets worthy of metaphorical stoning, complicates matters. These prophets speak of overturning established systems, returning controversial figures to power, and exposing sinister plans—proposals that sound outlandish to many, even within the church. Some believers agree with the outcomes prophesied but doubt the methods by which these will come to pass. Despite the skepticism, these prophets are becoming more precise in their predictions, discussing events like the Statue of Liberty submerged underwater, akin to the climactic scene in "Planet of the Apes," or Washington D.C. being destroyed and the capital relocating, perhaps to Philadelphia. They predict the deaths of major political figures and a shift towards a system resembling China's social credit score.

In another video, I will delve into these issues more deeply, as it indeed sounds quite dystopian. Yet, there is a recurring theme in these prophecies—the suddenness of major changes, which many find abrupt and hard to believe. However, some credible Christian voices foresee these transformations stemming from grassroots actions, where people vote out ineffective leaders in favor of those who will implement significant reforms. Nonetheless, the specific nature of these prophecies leaves little room for such gradual changes.

The biblical precedent for swift, significant changes is clear, as seen in Isaiah 9:14:

Therefore the Lord, in one day, will destroy the leaders of Israel and the lying prophets. (Isaiah 9:14, TLB)

You see, drastic shifts can happen in just one day. Similar instances include the siege of Samaria, the defeat of the Midianites, and the story of David and Goliath. Even the resurrection of Jesus fits this pattern of sudden divine intervention.

Given these precedents, it is not far-fetched to believe that God could again orchestrate such rapid changes. Whether these modern prophets are right or not, the potential for quick, transformative action is biblically sound. As we consider these prophecies, let us not be quick to dismiss them. Instead, let us watch, prepare, and pray, asking God for wisdom and readiness for whatever the future holds. As always, thank you for joining us on "God's News in the News."
